

AMAZING ASIAN ELEPHANTS!

We find out about the problems facing Asia's gentle giants and meet a woman who's helping them...

Mention elephants and most people usually think of the gigantic grey creatures roaming the African plains. But a smaller species of elephant lives in the forests of Asia. We spoke to expert Belinda Stewart-Cox to learn about Asian elephants and discover why they're endangered...

NGK Hi Belinda. Why do you think Asian elephants are not as well-known as African elephants?

Belinda Unlike African elephants, who live in open savannahs, most Asian elephants live in forests. This means they're harder to spot. Africa also has a more established nature-tourism industry than Asia.

NGK Why are Asian elephants so important?

Belinda They're the gardeners of the forest! They create change in their habitat by pushing over trees and pulling down branches to feed on bark, and this helps a lot of other animals. For example, when elephants tear down leaves and branches, they often cause fruit to fall on the ground, which smaller animals can then eat. In the dry season, when elephants dig for water, they create holes in the ground. These form puddles which frogs use to lay their eggs in!

NGK What do you think is the biggest threat to Asian elephants?

Belinda Humans. Elephants are large animals and they need large landscapes, but their habitat keeps being broken up by human settlements. Sadly, when people and elephants share the same space, there is conflict between them. Humans don't want elephants trampling over their land and houses. But elephants can't change the pathways they have used for generations.

NGK How can we help people and Asian elephants live together peacefully?

Belinda The main thing is to allow elephants to have plenty of habitat that's not broken up by development or human settlements. Education is also important as it teaches people how to react when they come face to face with a wild elephant. In India, people often throw firecrackers at wild elephants, or form large noisy crowds – this only make things worse. Giving elephants enough space will help ensure that no human or elephant gets hurt.

NGK You work for a charity called Elephant Family which is on a mission to protect Asian Elephants. Can you tell us about a project you've worked on?

Belinda We recently helped move a whole village in Assam, north-east India. The villagers were living in dangerous elephant pathways and were keen to move to a new, safer village. Their new homes are now nearer to markets, and for the first time they have brick houses, electricity and safe drinking water. They also have farmland where they can grow their crops without worrying that elephants will trample over them. The elephants are also better-off as their pathways are now protected and they can move freely and safely to other parts of the wider forest without encountering any humans. It's a win-win situation!

NGK That's great news! Good luck, Belinda and all of Elephant Family – keep on saving the Asian elephant!

It's Belinda!

Only adult male Asian elephants grow big tusks, although some remain tuskless for life. Female Asian elephants may have small tusks called tushes!

Fun in the water!

Asian elephants often walk through villages

Elephants are an important cultural and religious icon in Asia. One of the most popular Hindu gods is Lord Ganesha, who has an elephant head on a human body!

Asian elephants have much smaller and more rounded ears than their African cousins.

ELEPHANTS IN DANGER!

Over the last 100 years, Asian elephant numbers have plummeted by 90%. These magnificent creatures once roamed across most of Asia, but today they survive in just 15% of their original range.

These amazing animals need our help!

Over half of the Asian elephant population lives in India.

To find out more about Elephant Family and how you can help save the Asian elephant, visit elephant-family.org